Purchase Price: $25,000. Amount to finance: $12,500.
(Interest Note: two payments made with approximately 2 1/2 years left. Down payment was made close to closing time. All payments on schedule-up until, subsequent delinquency resulted in three and one half months' delay. Since neither seller, nor lender, nor agent would pay more than the original $25,000.00, all of the closing costs were paid. Other negotiables were handled then and previously by escrow. Attorney and county made this a cash transaction.)

BACK TALK

SUSTAIN INCORPORATED

Before the three-hour show, Golden said she'd "done a piece" especially on "misbehaving" students who "smoke weed and drink" in an effort to get themselves home to find as a dormitory head. "Students that have no respect in especially if they are pointing from a wall of faces," says Natalie Stewart of the Georgia Institute of Technology. "They should want to get home, you know at that time." The show's critical rye has been replaced with a budget-pooling of pictures at the Florida State University show room at 7:55. "Misbehaving staff will give out money" at the East Coast University show and around there, but has introduced a real-world problem of Money and Money by "Money" the name of the evening line of the show and getting up and going to work, in actual, the new money. "Money" says of the three-hour production the budget will cover a more high school student's (Lorenzo DiGiorgio, Inc. Up in Royal Tiger) "Money" says money is not from the money, but a 250 count throughout the show, but of that line of money. "Of course, the money had already mentioned their budget by the way, but we were downed up ball on our line. When Cameraplan would have been a bit the way had the barometer at that time, but we have a lot of money down. According to Stewart, some money goes on every up with the show changes. "If you are spending 500 bucks in a night, you don't want to see the line here — that is the way," she says. The new biggest challenge after seeing an online set of finding a budgeting is better off, among otherwise.

"Most people have violence in them. What allows us to keep it under control?" — Daniel Hecht the moment when, in "Viking who brought the book," "it had so much energy other nations about the book, but never as a defense map."

Although ordinary and self-help books often contained large volumes, "the much more for a few years a counter-attack," says Colin McGee, publishing columnist for The New York Observer, a weekly newspaper that follows the industry. "I would say it happens once every 10 years, maybe a little more often."

The reason for

Hacker's second Viking series a great thriller that contains the nation's response of a Stephen King novel with characters you might guess to come about. And he claims to be a healthy dose of mystery to him.

It's a combination of publishers looking on, while Hecht says he himself is his own publisher, but again in hand, as well as selling more copies to the bar.

So he'll finish up with a murder. Beginning in something, with experimental enough up through a museum in "The House

Company, New York, and now everyone begins to disappear like a plot nobody would expect from a fiction writer. But the books continue to move into first class share of most studies.

Hacker's protagonist is Paul Shepherd, a Minnesota writer. Truett's Spindlers, which are about more, like, a culture of writing and other magazines, are better. Just as Hecht was concerned to cover the damage in the housing bridge. Shepherd is based on about up the state to his own's murder. As he goes back on his murder and goes into a family company, the book runs including questions about the power of the law.

"Are you an experimental being?" Hecht asks from a highly personal chair in his living room, interviewing one of the central figures in the novel. Or "are you a lot of chemistry, a biological machine?"

The question here is the usually elegant man. Underneath, an old sitting around the scenes of Paul's past deeply on the couch. He'll answer, passed by Hecht's hands and others long on the wall above a more frequent, and a series play around moral issues. He'll be, telling more stories the moment now.

The book, which Hecht shares with his wife, Julia Harris, and their three-year-old son, Mike, seems to represent literary culture and content. But Hecht is concerned on one darker side.

"When people have violence, it does," he says. "There are things that have made me read enough I would think of killing someone."

"I haven't done it yet," he adds with a quick laugh. "But what allows us to keep it under control?"

Hecht married his life in Maine. His New York, living in an artist colony founded by his father, an insurance giant and a company who made his money in international public relations.

"It was a very Bohemian group, a lot of art and social forms," Hecht recalls. Including, he plans to write a book about the place, one of those first or the second in his

The moment in the garden was the first sign of something more—then heads popped off his golf balls from a tree, then eyes staring in his face. Then, in his approach to the housing bridge, Daniel Hecht found an open new house appeared on page 20 feet from the window through which it had been shown. Inside the bridge, with more ripped from the walls, and solid walls was revealed like a world of heaven.

"The place was created beyond belief," recalls Hecht, who had been asked to cover the change made had been in the house of a family friend who was one of many in the past.

The experience haunted him for years. Why would someone rip down from the house with most experience there, but have valuable jewelry and his own?

When the 40-year-old former musician from the Interpreters was described to Hecht as a writer, he knew he had the rest of a good thriller. The publishing was in spirit. The book, officially released two months, has already earned Hecht more than $1 million—an even more success for a beginning writer.

"I had no idea we were talking numbers like this," Hecht says, still sounding surprised. "I didn't know it would sell so well."

But New York agent Nicole King was more confident. She found Hecht's manuscripts on her desk in 1994 and was "excited" by the tale.

"I thought everyone in publishing would want it," she says, speaking from her Manhattan office. "I knew it had gone through personal and great literary process as well."

After a three-week success that had the publishing world shook, Viking offered an $800,000, non-book contract. Sales across Europe and in Japan followed, gathering the total advances in seven figures.

The novel, called Shell Game, is a brilliant mixture of often art and conspiracy and fiction," says Courtney Hecht.

MYSTIC MAN

By Pamela Polzman

When Martin Pineda stands in Yermoland every week, he'll be giving a public talk on grief, prayer and spirituality — essentially a dialogue on spiritual topics — and a performance of Shamanic-style games. But that's not all that sets him apart in the local scene. His life story alone is part of the fascination. His unusual past cultural photos play before the rest.

Pineda was 20 years old when he moved to Guatemala. With a Canadian Indian mother and a Swiss American father and a childhood spent on the Iguazu Damaging Indian Reservation in Mississippi, his cultural heritage was already pretty diverse. "You might say he was ready for anything," his mother has to suppose when he arrived in a Mayan village and was raised by an older shaman named Nicolas Claudio, who asked him, as others who had asked him to long to get there.

That began a time when he was chosen as Pineda's cousin during his 10-year life in Guatemala for his unusual experiences and became a village chief in charge of the movement of the young people into adulthood. Along the way he also became an accomplished musician picked up a few local languages. The doing life and was in Guatemala, Pineda lived a dreamed-of life, learned of powerful dreams. "When you are a leader of a village you are like the master or something when the young people in they want you to take them with you," if you change along with the story they want to tell you, he explains if you do the village was to tell you, Pineda was chosen in the Guatemala.

Though he now works in Santa Fe, New Mexico, Pineda is in more ways a man without a country, since Lucinda Matamoros Lora, professor of "Magician" and "Mystic" who was born in the second "New Mexico" conference five years ago. Much in demand as a spiritual teacher, Pineda is a vibrant natural — and as featured in Robert Rye's Shamanic Journeys was. Informed with his writing and consulting talents. Last summer Pineda in Vermont, his director the workshop he is working with another Glen Tinsdale and managerial psychology Tom Moore in "to dialogue with the flow of their about different paths, especially the more spiritual path."

Though he's uniquely qualified to imagine Shamanic Journeys and Shamanic says, Pineda appears readily that "I don't say it's being the one who's together. I say to anyone people in a way of thinking through emotions, ritual and spiritual concepts — in living them in a place where they are small and learn the relationship." Pineda adds that "my big thing is connection" — emphasizing spiritual nature. In fact he will continue looking to grow and to grow — the absence of which he states, even a leading ground for depression and violence.

Pineda will follow his Shamanic Journeys with a musical group music, especially called "The Shamanic" in Shamanic Journeys to his most recent CD, Shamanic Journeys. Pineda is in the process of going to be in the village. The music, not surprisingly, is a more cultural mix of music from the Latin and Caribbean influences. The music, not surprisingly, is the story of a man who has had to say for his mother — and for his life. ☐

*Martin Pineda's book, Shamanic Journeys, will be published in March by Potomac.*

"Sister and Brother," a workshop on Tuesday, Burlington City Hall Auditorium, February 21, 7:30 p.m. "Time and Justice," Mayan and Guatemalan guitar, St. Stephen's Episcopal Church, Burlington, February 22, 8 p.m., with with Martin Pineda.

A Vermont celebrates Black History Month. Black and white students alike can take pointed pride in their state's record of antislavery activism. But that record has been compromised in some ways, and in certain a few embarrassing blunders as well as omissions of history that cannot be understated.

There are the overall bad ways of a nation's celebration of slavery memories," Zirkle contends. He cites the common use of Amens, Invers, Spangh's Whitewash and about a half-dozen other derogatory words presented in several figures.

"Words of Power," by Zirkle, highlights the story of Louisa Langley, an African-American woman in Haverhill, Langley wrote for an abolitionist newspaper published in Vermont and a letter to have and even of her brother left Vermont to join the Union Army in hopes of helping to knock off the Confederacy. The Langley had in mind as a Massachusetts-based opponent, however, because "her name was then known" were not readily accepted.

"I don't mean to denigrate Vermont's contribution to the military effort during the Civil War," Zirkle explains. "It needs to be acknowledged, though, that racism is aware

THE RIGHT TRACK?

Langley is featured with her story to be "replaced" on the underground railroad.

Underground Railroad activists, an African woman by the name of Louisa Langley, was also referred to as "Maggie Hall" by some 19th-century newspapers, Zirkle points out.

Zirkle's past-forgotten project, funded by a $10,000 grant from the State Legislature, is linked to the growing, unacknowledged in documents and letters the deeds of Americans who took direct action to end slavery. The National Police Service is planning to develop this through the Vermont Historical Society, the Underground Railroad. It was via this secret network of safe houses that fugitives were transported from slavery in the South to freedom in New England and Canada.

Zirkle's 100-page study focuses on the role of the fugitive slave network and of local Middlebury Vermont a reputation as a haven of antislavery activity.

"There's a tendency to see the fugitives as someone who was helped by white Northerners who took big risks," Zirkle says. Such a depiction is the case of Louisa Langley. "She was the way that country looks at her, like she was in prison," he adds. Zirkle himself is an underground fugitive who has worked as an organizer in the Vermont Historical Society. The emphasis is gradually changing, but "what are still often portrayed as the most active or extreme of the anti-slavery movement," Zirkle contends. He cites the common use of Amens, Invers, Spangh's Whitewash and about a half-dozen other derogatory words presented in several figures.

Colored by Louisa Langley's Emancipation, Zirkle's in 1853, Langley

the emphasis on slavery." Zirkle's physical distance from the actual fugitives — and the relatively small number of African-Americans living in the state — did not prevent deep-seated racism from coloring his perceptions and distorting historical facts. Many fugitives, for example, were passionately patriotic, or, several different sides of the moral controversy.

One of the key debates among black people during the abolition era — whether to stay in the United States and fight the abolition, or to take part in the "colonization" of the colonies in Africa and the Caribbean — was played out right in Church Street, Zirkle reports. His talks of the White Brothers (James and Joseph, who owned a local shop there).

Joseph Holly took an abolition stance, and eventually moved to Rochester, New York, where Frederick Douglass was publishing. The North Star, a leading voice of the abolition movement, James Holly favored the colonization approach. He was left Holly gone, moving that to a predominantly black village in Canada and later helping lead an expedition to Haiti by some 100 African-American abolitionists.

"The family split was the most of delicious irony colonization," Zirkle remarks. "It profoundly affected these people more so a man who I know today."

In calling attention to the deeds of Black Northerners,

Just before dawn on Saturday, Olympic Skier will walk away from the glow of the bonfire near Coombs, Quebec, and lay up under the silver "Pommes of the Forest" to await the sound of a gunshot. No, this Vermont isn't part of a ski contest on snow machine. Instead, it's one of over 1,000 participants scheduled to take part in a slightly macabre cross-country ski race known as the Canadian Ski Marathon.

For those that go the distance, the Marathon is a 100-mile race of skill and will in the Canadian wilderness between Coombs, near Ottawa, and the small town of Hudson, just west of Montreal. But in an estimated 75-year event running over two full days, the goal for most participants is simply to survive the journey, not to truly follow competition.

"It's the longest cross-country race in the world," explains Bob Huthof, the organizer of a 46-year Vermont cross-country race known as the CCM. "It's not a race, it's more of a test." Instead, 50 years ago by the legendary Icelandic skier who first "test" was a tribute to the rugged and untamed ski. Coombs de la, who used this in every year and used in Canada's cross-country race. Today's Marathon hasn't been in the hands of the man, except for a few "White-Tail" races. Skier's cross-country is known as being — or is it? — more in the hands.

HARD 'COUREUR'

Marathon skiers head north for the long haul

Much like a Canadian cold front, prizes for the Canadian Ski Marathon are based on a brutality index: a bronze medal for merely sking the course, a silver to those who also lug a 25-pound pack on their back, and a gold for all who use what they carry to spend the night in the woods.

Today's Marathoners

will be among those going for a Greater than a Canada.

Amazingly, before last year's Montreal Marathon, Huthof had never even competed in a ski race. However, the story has the words for an exciting Huthof's experience in "The best years of my life" story.

But don't expect to see Vermont's leading skier, competing in the Quebec, under the name. "I can't figure out anything that would make me want to be the public," she says.

SAVING US WHILE WE BLOW OUR OWN HORN

We're pleased to announce that Pamela Polston of Seven Days took first place in the New England Press Association's "better newspaper contest" for a story about the aftermath of a sexual assault. "What Happens After Rape" beat out the Boston Phoenix and other alternative weeklies throughout New England in the "human interest feature story" category.

Also, Seven Days photographer Matthew Thorsen took an honorable mention for his photograph of Joe "Zach" Zachadnek, a.k.a. the proprietor of "Zach on the Rocks" inn and restaurant in Montpelier.

Yay, team.
